Not illustrated. 1866 Excerpt: .by Mr. Loftus at Warka, an ancient Babylonian site, look amazingly like slipper baths. Christmas now intervened, and was kept at Mosul, where there were other Christians, native as well as foreign, like our explorer. Operations were afterwards resumed at Nimrud, chiefly in the North-west Palace, the most ancient and productive of the ruins. Three months work here caused the entire result to be, that of this under-ground palace twenty-eight rooms had been cleared out and examined, all more or less lined with sculptured slabs of the nature of those already described. Colossal-winged figures, eagle-headed divinities, warlike scenes, hunting pieces, religious ceremonies, made up the staple of them. Winged bulls and lions of course turned up wherever it was possible for them to do so. One remarkably fine bas-relief was now met with of the king by whom the palace was built--Asshurizir-pal, according to Sir Henry Rawlinson's reading of his Assyrian name, the Sardanapalus the Great of the Greek historians, from whom what little we knew of Assyrian matters previous to these discoveries was chiefly obtained. He is dressed in the ordinary rich royal robes, with armlets, bracelets, and immense ear-rings. It must be remarked that in the sculpture itself the face has a less pleasing expression than that given to it in the cut; the under jaw projects more, monkey fashion. The eyes and sandals show traces of colour, which it is believed was not usually employed in sculpture, save at times on the eyes,...
