A gurgling sound, half chuckle, and half groan, a stream of blood, and all was over. I raised him up, drew out the murderous weapon, tied up the throat; but his heart had ceased to beat--there was no struggle now. I knew that he was dead. I tried to open the doors or windows; but in vain--all were fast. There was I, in the presence of the dead. The tragedy had been enacted so suddenly, and I had been so full of excitement, that the after consequences had never had my consideration at all, and it was not till after assuring myself that no spark of life remained, that I began to think over the matter. Here was I, a stranger, and unable to...
