Excerpt: . . . who take no care to satisfy themselves that they will ever be able to give title to the property which they have con-tracted to sell is an incident which is unfortunately too common in the purchase and sale of real property for immediate specu-lative purposes. The vendor accepted the statement of the person who sold to him. He made no personal investigation of title and did not employ a solicitor to do so. It is surely a case where the vendor cannot be held to be without default where he exhibits such want of care and such absolute failure to make investigation of his title when he proceeds to sell on a speculative market. If the vendor had employed solicitors to investigate title, the failure of registration of Spencers transfer within the statutory period would have been apparent and the defect in title disclosed. I would therefore dismiss the appeal. It is common knowledge that the reckless contracts of The case before us is an example of one such. Appeal allowed with costs, SIMMONS, J. , d1ssenting.
